Patterns of tumor cell invasion in the gastric wall suggest the contribution of different metastatic mechanisms. We studied histologic patterns of gastric tumor cell invasion, including the proportion of tumor cells in the submucosa, as a function of the ability of gastric cancer cells to form spheroids in vitro, the expression of CA 19-9, and the invasive capacity. The relationship between these parameters and tumor-node-metastasis stage were also investigated. Of 100 tumor specimens, 46 exhibited expansile growth with ulceration, 35 with superficial growth with or without ulceration, and 19 with infiltrative growth. The proportion of tumor cells in the submucosa was significantly smaller in the expansile growth than the other two types of tumor cells. No difference was found in the proportion of tumor cells in the submucosa between the superficial and infiltrative growth tumors. In the expansile type of tumors, the invasive capacity was significantly greater in the tumor cells of superficial growth than in those of the infiltrative growth, while the proportion of tumor cells in the submucosa was significantly higher in the infiltrative growth than in the superficial growth. CA 19-9 was expressed in only six of 46 (13%) of the expansile type tumor cells, whereas 38 of 53 (73%) of the superficial growth tumor cells expressed CA 19-9. Of the cases in which tumor cells expressed CA 19-9, the invasive capacity was significantly greater in the superficial growth type than the other type, while the proportion of tumor cells in the submucosa was significantly greater in the expansile growth type than the superficial growth type. These results indicate that superficial growth tumor cells have the characteristics of being aggressive, invasively invasive, and capable of producing CA 19-9 and that expansile growth tumor cells have the characteristics of being superficial and having the tendency to grow as spheroids.Q: Creating a List on the fly in C# How can I create a list on the fly in C#?
