Kiwi Syslog Daemon is designed for remote process control processing of messages from the system log Linux server. It allows users to connect to the log to see what is happening on the server and to handle this event with their command. In this case the "event" is event that has been "logged". This event can either occurring on the client side (e.g., a user entered something, or emailed something, or did something in a browser), or it is event that occurs on the server (e.g., when a connection is established to its database). Some examples of events might include. "SSL Certificate Requested" or "Certificate Requested. Please provide the certificate and certificates for installation. Certificates have not been requested or certificates have been requested that are not valid may result in denial of access to the site. If you are not sure if the certificates you are requesting are actually valid, please contact your certificate provider. If you do not request certificates and do not use certificates for authentication, you may find that you cannot log on to the server. You may be able to get a certificate in place if you have another computer from which you can install it on your server using another computer. This is often recommended in Microsoft's documentation, and it's a more secure way. If you want to use a web platform, you might consider using a different web server. For example, you might consider anything you want to do to run them on Windows 2003 Server rather than XP. In fact, what you want to do is probably not possible on XP. Alternatively, you might also consider building a Web site in ASP.NET. ASP.NET has built-in features for building web applications that don't work on XP There are many ways to do this. It mostly depends on what server you want to run the site on. If it's Windows Server 2003, you can use IIS. Or, if it's a Windows server, you can use Apache HTTPD.
