She was best known for helping develop some of the first county elections systems in the United States. Among the notable projects she helped with was the development of the first electronic voter registration system. After her death in 2002, she became a candidate in a series of lawsuits related to the early stages of the practice of chattel slavery and the mass incarceration of African Americans in the United States. Williams was the granddaughter of Henry E. Williams, a station agent on the Great Western Railway who served under British rule, and his wife, Anna. Her father was Nigerian. Early life Williams was born Doreen Lily in Lawndale, a neighborhood on Chicago's south side. She attended Hyde Park High School, and, as a teenager, worked as a legal secretary for a judge who occupied a Victorian house on the north side. After the death of her father in 1945, Williams and her mother moved to the South Side and stayed there for the rest of her life. They lived in a series of modest homes in the neighborhood; she later remembered the last one as "small and old, surrounded by a ditch." Her mother found work working in a garment factory, sometimes on as many as four shifts a day. Williams was a child who missed school from time to time, and she and her mother moved often; in 1949, they ended up in a run-down apartment building where they stayed for a while. Career In 1947, after completing high school, Williams began working for the United States Post Office, where she was able to retain her bachelor's degree. She went on to work as a secretary for federal judges and politicians, and was regarded as highly skilled in her field. She went on to work for the Cook County Board of Elections, the first election board in the United States to provide a computerized voter registration system. She also worked for the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners. Williams oversaw the process of translating the United States census data into the first national voter registration form. The input and verification of voter data was accomplished by her and other employees at the election board. Williams was also a friend of Eleanor Holmes Norton
