As government employees across the U.S. consider a strike, also known as a work stoppage or a shutdown, at the end of the day

Monday there's a chance that federal clerks and court employees could be without pay for a week. Court employees are considered "excepted" from the Federal Employee Compensation Act, or FECA, a law that usually keeps such workers on payroll during a shutdown. This could put the court system on the hook for roughly $2 million a day, or nearly $26 billion overall during the ongoing partial government shutdown. Several federal court workers in California said court closures and reductions in hours have meant they will be without paychecks at the end of the day on Monday. "We don't get paid until we go to work," said

Dale Leff, a witness assistant at the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in the Central District of California who works in the courtroom of Judge Louisa Saldana. The federal government has said it would provide some of the employees who would not be required to work during a shutdown to receive the normal amount of pay they would have received if they were working, while other employees would have their pay withheld. Still, a shortage of federal funds could make that promise impossible for some workers to fulfill, leaving them with outstanding paychecks. "We are seeing some of our employees being paid less than the federal minimum," said Chris

Damas, communications director for the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Central District of California. "We are seeing some employees already living paycheck to paycheck," Damas added. Court employee Leff isn't the only one struggling to make ends meet during a partial shutdown. Others include legal assistants, paralegals and others whose work allows them to assist the court system during closures. "I'm having a really hard
