Support.January 19, 2010 at 09:16 Tags 5k tools & frameworks I've been working on a standalone web performance tool for quite a while, and it's been great, but unfortunately it requires a significant time investment as it has quite a lot of features and involves a lot of the web's systems. Because of this I'm planning on open-sourcing this code to a library that would help developers to write better performing web apps - and, unlike my tool, this will become generally available to everyone. There's been some interest recently to create a widely used library for web performance, so I've decided to try to tackle this by completing a web-perf framework in Ruby, in both its client and server form
