Holy moly! It's been a hot minute, so I haven't been able to take all the time to properly tend to this blog. However, as I look back, the last few months have been incredibly busy in our office. As soon as I received a message one day from my sweet friend Valerie, who is the perfect recipe wrangler for me, I had to come in and start working. Because, well, the recipe she sent me, was one of those too good to be true ones! If I remember correctly, I never would have started to make these if it was less than perfect and Valerie was dead serious. I'll be the first to admit that the first batch of these truffles were a huge flop. A few days later, I made the recipe again, prepping my two sets of ingredients. And trust me, this was a better version! These coconut milk chocolate truffles are the perfect bite for a weight loss extravaganza or workout party. They are filling enough for a sweet snack, but not too sweet. The protein and fiber added to the cocoa powder and coconut milk adds lasting energy and will keep you satisfied until dinner. This recipe calls for adding chocolate chips, but you can add any chopped or shaved chocolate. For the right amount of chocolate, 1/2 a cup is plenty. But don't let that stop you from adding more! Just be careful when adding more chocolate that it doesn't make your truffles too dry or become difficult to chew. Scoop into a small bowl or individual dish and set in the refrigerator to allow the coconut milk to harden while making the chocolate coating. Using a mini food processor, combine the coconut milk and cocoa powder into a smooth, creamy mixture. Once the coconut milk and cocoa powder has been combined, add in the peanut butter and salt, and process. If you're using a fresh coconut milk, instead of canned coconut milk, you may notice a

Games Radar: “It’s a good-looking action RPG that’s compelling and varied, an absolutely enormous area to explore and a wonderful sense of scale that really drives home the true scale of the game.” Pocket Gamer: “A fun and epic fantasy experience, with huge, interconnected areas to explore, it's ideal for players who like their fantasy with a bit of an edge.” I've never played a role-playing game of any kind before, and I got interested in this one purely because of one factor: I just love the concept of this game. If it doesn't come to Steam, I'm giving up all hope for the universe.

I'm not sure if this is a first-person action RPG or a third-person RPG, but it plays a little like both. I don't know how to best describe it because each of the five characters play differently, and with each being designed with an a specific type of gameplay style. All of these players have a pretty major role in the story and how it plays out, and having four of them on the field at once just makes for a fun game where it feels like you're all in the same fight to save the world as a group of five people instead of just yourself. At the end of each chapter, the main story will be taking place in a town, and depending on which type of character you play, the character and controls are a little different from other chapters. I was able to play each of the characters from chapter to chapter without going into boss battles, and they were all interesting in their own way. I'm not sure how the combat will be, but it's definitely streamlined and not as involved as other RPGs. It seems to have a similar format to the Dragon Quest games for example, and the combat feels like an isometric action RPG with a lot of variety. You'll be controlling the typical big, robotic dog/humanoid/etc., but each of the characters has their own specialized attacks which you can enhance when you get new abilities. The controls are easy to pick up, but of course, it's as simple as any RPG. I enjoyed the game immensely while I played through it, and I'm really looking forward to seeing how the story progresses. The variety makes it something I wouldn't mind playing for a while, and I'm willing to say that I'll see this game through to the end, though I can't say how

What's new:

A simple layered PHP script to generate lovely, simple HTML tags in batches of over a thousand at a time. Everything is asynchronous, but it's the only way to do things in this web of ours. Circular buffers which let you add and remove items while being in motion, but prevent you from removing the last entry. Ergo, perma-list. Nothing is ever removed, but my child's decedents will live on forever. A simple, quick and easy-to-deploy PEAR extension which lets you grab the contents of your target location and then either save it locally, or dump to a CSV file. Want to buffer a log file, then send it to your servlet? Easy. With PEAR you can pipe your log file contents out to a file, and then have the servlet write that file. There is not a single thing to change or optimize about this script if your main goal is to serve PHP on Apache. You can optimize this script for speed and memory, but it doesn't matter as you can easily serve using PHP directly over your running Apache instance. I built this script to allow my system to queue up RSS feeds and then publish them in batches, but to make it a bit more compact, I left most of the documentation about basic usage out. I didn't want to make it too complex. Using this script, you can subscribe to things like the rss feed, or anything that can be dumped into your feeds and publish it online in small batches, without having to queue up all of those feeds to be published every time a new batch is completed. For example, I have a database of thousands of words. If I want to notify Flickr of a change in the Flickr blog, I don't want to have to buffer the entire list of 2500 items or more to send to Flickr or anything like that. I want to buffer 3000 words so that I can publish 3 publications at a time (or, alternatively, once I commit to these 3000 words, I can load them to the database, buffer about 2000 more, and update Flickr once the new batch is ready). This script will store words in three different circular buffers. The default size is set at 3000 words in a main circular buffer which is used to queue all new and changed words to be processed. A fast buffer is used to keep up with the shuffling of words between the main and inner buffering. An inner inner fast circular buffer is used to buffer the small time
