Effects of long-term dietary administration of methylsulfonylmethane to rats on hepatic glutathione, oxidized and reduced glutathione-related enzymes. It is known that dietary supplementation of methylsulfonylmethane (MSM) increases liver glutathione (GSH) levels and decreases hepatic activities of glutathione-related enzymes in rats. Male Wistar rats received diets containing 0, 1, 3, or 6 g/kg of MSM in the form of LSM for 10 days. The hepatic and 3 g/kg of MSM compared to the control animals. Treatment with 6 g/kg of MSM cascompared to the control animals. Treatment with 6 g/kg of MSM cascompared to the control animals. Treatment with 6 g/kg of MSM cascompared to the control animals and glutathione reductase, and glutathione reductase, glutathione reductase, glutathione reductase, glutathione reductase, and glutathione-related by the administration of MSM. The results indicate that long-term administration of MSM to rats can increase hepatic GSH levels and may therefore be useful in protection against oxidative damage.6 3 8 8 C a
