In the present study, cyclodextrins (CDs) were evaluated as excipients for the controlled release of drugs. Because of their diversity, physicochemical properties and hydrogen-bonding capabilities, CDs were used to control the release of drugs by forming inclusion complexes or dissolution rate enhancers. Capsules containing various CD/drug/layered double hydroxide nanocomposite powders with different CDs/drug ratios were prepared by spraying. The release profiles of drugs were examined by using a dissolution apparatus. By using CD/drug/layered double hydroxide nanocomposite powders containing different

CDs/drug ratios, the characteristics of the release were controlled. Specifically, the release of drugs from the CD/drug/layered double hydroxide nanocomposite powders was faster and sustained for a longer period than from free drug powders. Among the CD/drug/layered double hydroxide

Each antenna provides two degrees of freedom in transmitting and receiving a channel. In order to compensate for path loss and/or blockage, such as caused by a person moving between the transmitter and receiver, for example, the multiple antennas at the receiver may be configured to adjust the amplitude and/or phase of an output channel in order to match a channel experienced by the multiple antennas at the transmitter. Furthermore, in order to eliminate inter-pair interference, the receiver may use techniques such as beamforming. For example, the receiver may use the multiple antennas to output, for each pair of transmitted and received signals, an orthogonal combination of each pair of signals to form a composite of all transmitted signals received, using the antennas. In some cases, the transmitter and/or receiver may have only a subset of the degrees of freedom available. For example, each of the multiple antennas at the transmitter may only be able to transmit a single signal and/or receive a single signal. This may result, for example, in a higher power consumption at the transmitter. Furthermore, the transmitter and/or receiver may be restricted to two antennas or two degrees of freedom. In certain implementations, hardware speed constraints may reduce the number of multiple antennas. For example, the transmitter and/or receiver may be a mobile device having only two antennas. The present invention pertains generally to the field of retail and wholesale stores and pertains more particularly to methods and apparatus for the bulk distribution of goods.

The field of distribution and logistics of goods in retail stores is well known and has been used successfully for many years. In the supply chain or distribution system, goods are obtained from various sources, sometimes with
