Escaping North Korea – Travel After Midnight At The Border Traveling to North Korea is incredibly difficult. Yet, due to the high amount of restrictions and a lack of exchange, many go anyways. At the border, foreigners are restricted to a number of hours to be in the countries. We spend about three hours at the border with South Korea which gets exponentially long closer to midnight. The leader of North Korea Kim Jong-un has said he will not allow any foreign tourists to enter the country. So we are traveling at the international border which is only five minutes away from the North Korean border. Unlike the border at the border, foreigners can stay here for longer. We leave here at about 1:30am and we arrive at the North Korean border at 3:30am. On a regular visit, foreigners are required to make a ten-minute recce in the last ten minutes to make sure there are no soldiers checking people. That said, this is during the day and with the recce, there are many things that can go wrong. First, there is the driver. He is designated by the government to take these vehicles across the border and know which vehicle to check and which vehicle to take into North Korea. In this instance, he takes my friend and I through the 2nd and 5th checkpoints where there are many soldiers and lookouts. Despite the recce, there were five soldiers that checked us and our vehicle. In comparison to the recce, the North Korean soldiers are less strict. They check for passports and information about us and our visit is written on our passports. After this, the vehicle changes direction and we arrive at the 3rd checkpoint. North Koreans check for cars coming in and out of North Korea. In the past, refugees have escaped to South Korea via the border. During the Cold War, North Korea was the land that separated Soviet and American soldiers. It is my understanding that this has become a safer travel region for tourists, so this is a great area to be in the border. I was told the first hour at the border is the worst. That is, both the South and North Korean officials have lots of restrictions. This is where they review the cars and search for contraband. The North Korean soldiers that check us are really friendly. With them, there is a nice, long conversation as they search our car. However, the guards also have their limits. They will not check you if you have toiletries, umbrellas or umbrell
