Q: How to write .NET Security Verification rules for method permissions I use Verity to write safety nets and verification rules for my C# code. I understand that there are rules for method permissions. I can't find how to translate them in the Verity Explorer. For instance : (Parameters can not be null) [Guid.Empty] public void CreateNewObject([NullCheck] object parameters) I haven't found how to put the null-check rule in the Error section of the rule A: For the above example, you could try something like this : [Guid.Empty] public void CreateNewObject([NullCheck("parameters")] object parameters) [NullCheck("parameters")] checks that parameters can not be null. Depending on how Verity handles other types (string, int etc), you may need to specify a more specific rule. Q: Is it possible to see identity face by face in Daz Studio? I have received my copy of Daz Studio today, but I can't see if the face's identity is still broken in my facebank. Is there a way of seeing identity face by face? A: Daz Studio: You can find out where your face begins and ends by right clicking on your face and selecting "Edit Face." If you then select the "Show Edges" option (Shift + F5), you should see a line around the edge of your face. The center of the face is exactly the midpoint of this line. In 2.6, there is now a new Editor tab in the "Edit Face" context menu (it will appear whether or not you have the "Show Edges" option selected) which will allow you to select faces using a Fuzzy Selector. A less intrusive way of doing this is to select the face using a Brush Select. This will edit your face in such a way that the edges will not show up as though they were separate faces. Daz 4.0: Since Daz Studio 4.0 (Daz 4.0 Face Editor), you can select faces using a brush like you normally would. A small rectangle will appear when you select a face, and you can move the face by moving the rectangle. Fuzzy select also works. You can still right-click on a face and select Edit
