A common technique employed in the prior art to obtain a desired shape in the human body is to cut a piece of material, then surgically repair the cut using sutures. Several problems exist with this technique. The first is that there is a tremendous amount of tension at the suture point, particularly when repairing joints such as the knee or shoulder. If the repair is not ideal, the tension causes the point of incision to swell and cause discomfort. The second problem is that the suture material is difficult and time consuming to tie in surgical knots. The knots must be carefully placed with surgical forceps and are generally tied with the aid of the surgeon's free hand. This problem is particularly acute in arthroscopic or endoscopic surgical procedures, where the space and visibility are relatively small. Once the sutures are passed through the tissue, the process then becomes tedious and time consuming. During the surgical procedure, the surgeon must carefully watch the surgery site to locate the sutures. The sutures are then carefully grasped in a surgical knotting instrument and pulled through the tissue. If they are accidentally misplaced, they must be searched for and found, by sometimes expending a great deal of time and effort. Another problem with the traditional suture knot is that it provides no positive stop against motion or against pulling through the knot. Because of this, many surgeons believe that there is a possibility of cutting through the knot during the procedure, whereby the knot becomes untied and the tissue

A: If you can't get a corporate policy to support this, then I would recommend installing something like Splunk to capture events then watch for anomalies, you could also make sure that only trusted users are able to connect. Alternatively, you could set up something like pSense or another firewall appliance to monitor the network for strange traffic and block it, or you could monitor traffic on the local network using Wireshark.
