The First AutoCAD App AutoCAD's development was started by three engineers from Transmeta Corporation: Jeff Upton, Shailesh Vaya, and Paul Stephenson. They came up with the original idea for AutoCAD in December 1982, when they attended a graphic software workshop at the National Center for Supercomputing Applications (NCSA) at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. The NCSA Graphics Workshop, for which Autodesk developed AutoCAD, featured three of the first commercially available computer-aided design and drafting software applications. These applications were none other than the three games written by Dan Bunten for the original Altair 8800 computer in 1971, along with two additional games written for the first Apple II computer in 1977. They were the three games credited in the instruction manual for Altair BASIC: Dig Dug, Pong, and Spacewar!. The Sketch Pad Dan Bunten's very first game was called the Sketch Pad. It was the first computer graphics game, which debuted in October, 1971 on the Altair 8800. It was coded in BASIC and was a very simple game, consisting of a triangular board with a grid of square tiles. On the board, the player's spaceship was drawn in a fixed direction with a fixed speed. On each turn, the player drew a tile from the board's surface. If the tile was a ship, the player was rewarded for shooting the ship and removed the tile from the board. If the tile was a wall, the player received a point. Bunten's Sketch Pad was a reaction to the drawings created by his predecessor at MIT Lincoln Lab, Steve Russell, with a Sharp Portable, a drawing tool about the size of a medium sized box of matches. Russell had implemented a novel feature for his line drawing tool: each line was split into a series of individual pins which were all wired to a counter and shared a common "to" and "from" endpoint. This setup was designed to alleviate the frustrations Bunten had experienced with the constraint of drawing only in a vertical line. Bunten realized that this split-pin concept could also be used to build a game. On a board with a grid of tiles, each pin would be a token representing a single object. If the pin was turned vertically into a wall tile, the player received a point. Bunten's Sketch Pad became the first computer game to use a board and a board's surface as
