What's new:

might not be such a bad thing if it resembled something in most people. For those of us who have been living on this planet the longest, it manifests as hatred, resentment, rage, and impatience, the latter sometimes disguised as humor. From a population health standpoint, the distinguishing characteristic of such feelings is much in evidence in certain places in the U.S. The incidence of anger is high in the U.S. Even though anger is a common emotional response, it is probably not over-valued, in itself. The combination of anger and ill feeling has, however, a significant impact upon health outcomes. For example, among men and women in the U.S., those who are over-stressed, angry, and frustrated are much more likely to have heart attacks. But why do so many Americans appear immune to the relation of anger to stress or risk, despite all the evidence of the connection? In my experience, it seems quite understandable. Most of us are in the social position of being chronically over-stressed in our everyday lives. It is of little consequence what is happening to others around us, so long as our own immediate stress does not reach unacceptable levels. Pessimists would subscribe to the God's-eye view that says anything can happen, so, there is rarely any cause for concern. We tend to choose to ignore the evidence and stick with the comfortable delusion that nothing can happen to us. In the face of stress, the higher brain in the human is unconsciously rather cleverly, and by way of "split-brain" operations, it tends to take charge and determine that which is actually thought to be correct and useful. So, it can find much to be cheerful and comfortable, in spite of having little basis for such a conclusion. If one day the tables are turned and the stress is real, one can have a very different view of life, which is likely to convert to a complete transformation of personality. Such a transformation would recognize a new, distanced point of view, one where events appear to change form for the worse. But the heart is not always so soft. Being seduced by the "thin end of the wedge" of angst, one can condition oneself to the extent that all events are potentially fearful. This amounts to being "on edge" in a chronic way. Getting some perspective is an oft-cited solution that is recommended to those who have experienced a "winding up" of the dimension of the soul. The mind lives
