So you must beÂ .Developmental and hereditary expression of a common processed pseudogene in nematode species. It is proposed that a common processed pseudogene, termed the GK gene, in the nematode Caenorhabditis elegans is induced by the effects of negative selectors operating during embryonic development. GK is required to be expressed transiently at certain stages of development, and its induction is associated with alterations in the modulation of a second gene, hsp-16.2, that is expressed under the control of stress or heat-shock genes. We have now established that a similar gene, GK1, is expressed in a similar restricted manner in the other nematode species, C. briggsae. A third related gene, GK2, is expressed in both C. elegans and C. briggsae, but is expressed constitutively in C. elegans; thus, three related but distinctive sets of hsp-16.2-related genes appear to be expressed in these nematodes. The genetic data provided by the C. elegans hsp-16.2 gene indicate that it is subject to selective forces that operate in both ways. The gene is expressed only under the control of stress genes in the germline in C. elegans, but is induced and maintained in the soma by the negative selectors in both C. elegans and C. briggsae. The data suggest that common elements of heat-shock control in the germline and soma exist in nematodes, but also that different levels of genetic control are employed in the two nematode species.Q: AngularJS route redirect I am trying to redirect a user after a successful login to the home page.
