Perturbative techniques as a tool to study density functional theory in the tight-binding limit. We develop a perturbative method which allows us to compute the total energy of any tight-binding model and to study the resulting density functional theory in the tight-binding limit. This method is based on a perturbative Taylor expansion in the hopping parameter. We use this technique to analyze the atomic limit, as well as the large-U Hubbard model, where the exact solution is known. The perturbative approach developed in this paper is intended to be a useful tool for studying the Hubbard model since it provides a simple way to obtain, with high accuracy, the exact solution for weak interactions. The validity of this approach is also investigated by comparing numerical results obtained using the expansion truncated at different orders with the results of more accurate calculations performed in the literature for the Hubbard model. Effect of thiol reagents on the binding and inhibition of the phenothiazine tranquilizers. The major effect of DTT or GSH was to enhance the inhibition of [3H]flunitrazepam binding by the phenothiazine tranquilizers alprazolam and triazolam. This effect was largely due to enhancement of the dissociation of the compound from the binding site. In contrast, the effect of DTT on the binding of etizolam and clozapine was to displace the compounds with higher affinity from the binding site. Exposure of the membranes to the thiols did not prevent inhibition by the compounds of [3H]flunitrazepam binding. Pretreatment of the membranes with increasing concentrations of GSH and DTT resulted in greater inhibition of [3H]flunitrazepam binding and higher apparent dissociation constants for etizolam and clozapine binding, suggesting that inactivation of the benzodiazepine receptor. The results show that the molecular sites of both flunitrazepam and diazepam are sensitive to the reducing agents. However, the sites for these sites and etizolam and clozapine are dissociable from one another.
