The photodetachment spectrum of the lowest-energy $Mg(2+)(H)(n)Mg(n)$ ($n = 0-4$) clusters is computed and compared to experimental data obtained using time-of-flight mass spectrometry. The calculations show that the clusters react with low-energy electrons in the spectrometer as predicted for stable Mg clusters but with large kinetic energy release. The weakly bound ground-state complexes, however, are not stable enough to release the excess energy, and dissociation occurs in the spectrometer as a highly delayed process. This result is explained by two-body fission being the dominant reaction mechanism of the excited complexes in the time-of-flight spectrometer.require
