Issues in the implementation of a capitation arrangement for health care. The University of Iowa Health Care example. A pilot study sponsored by the Iowa Department of Social Services was conducted to study the feasibility of a capitation model for the provision of health care services to welfare recipients. The study provides an in-depth examination of the organizational structure, financing, and administration of this experiment; it also examines the results of the use of capitation as an incentive for improving the efficiency of the delivery of services. The study recommends procedures for developing capitation programs which will be generalizable across state and nationwide. Q: What tense should I use for a "negative recognition"? I want to write that a subject was recognized by somebody for its achievements in a negative sense. In other words, I want to write that this subject was recognized without being awarded for the achievements. It can't be a simple past tense because it would lead to ambiguity in the meaning. Is there a better way to express it than: It was not acknowledged for its achievements Does a simple past work in this case? A: As it is, that sentence can be interpreted in two ways. It was not acknowledged for its achievements It was not acknowledged for its achievements Thus, I would suggest the same sentence but use the past perfect instead of the simple past. The past perfect would make it clear which of the two scenarios the sentence describes, and the past perfect implies that the acknowledgement was done before the achievements. It had not been acknowledged for its achievements A: As you have already pointed out, there's ambiguity. However, there is an alternative: It had not been acknowledged for its achievements. This is a bit of a tortured way of saying it. However, it's strong and definitely is in the negative sense. (Note, if you read the full
