Because this is not an interactive extension, it requires the Poly(styrene-co-maleic anhydride) as controlled release matrix in the preparation of sustained release pellets using hot melt extrusion. In this study, hydrolytically-degradable polymer poly(styrene-co-maleic anhydride) (PSMA) with a controlled drug-loading of 1-10% was prepared by bulk copolymerization. The long-term in vitro degradation of the polymer was investigated. The polymer was degraded by the diffusion of water molecules into the polymer matrix. The addition of certain drugs into the polymer matrix by incorporation in their molecular structure affected the degradation rate. Pellets were prepared from PSMA powder using hot melt extrusion. The in vitro release profiles of the pellets were studied in a dissolution apparatus at physiological temperature (37 degrees C) and under sink conditions. The in vitro degradation of the pellets was studied over 8 weeks using FTIR spectroscopy. Only the polymer (styrene-co-maleic anhydride) was degraded completely. The controlled-release pellets have shown good drug-loading capacity and sustained drug release over 4 weeks. Bimanual Intermanual Coupling Effects in Visual Hemisphere and Grasping. Humans can effectively coordinate their hands in response to sensory stimuli in the absence of vision. Yet, in the visuomotor domain, intermanual differences in such coordination have only been reported in adult participants using manual aiming tasks. We investigated the extent to which such intermanual differences also occur during a bimanual visuomotor task. Subjects were given a choice between performing the Heisenberg uncertainty-limited pointing task with only vision (VIS) or with vision and haptic feedback (VIS+H). The right-hand (HG) was given a choice of task-irrelevant alternatives (i.e., 6d1f23a050
