The 36-year-old, known only as "John Doe" in court documents, was shot after he pointed a gun at officers at a BP gas station at 522 West 116th Street in the Bronx around 7:45 a.m., officials said. According to officials, the suspect's death occurred at Mount Sinai Beth Israel Hospital on Manhattan's Upper West Side. "It was a shooting which has happened unfortunately in the neighborhood, at a hospital which is a very busy hospital in the city," NYPD Chief of Detectives Robert Boyce said at a news conference Wednesday. "We cannot confirm that [John Doe] was a patient at the hospital. We believe he was acting in concert with individuals who were at the hospital." Police said they have found a vehicle registered to Doe's girlfriend near the location of the shooting. The car had crashed in Harlem, where the woman was arrested and charged with refusing to identify herself to police. It was not immediately clear if the vehicle was involved in the shooting. The woman was taken to a hospital after being shot in the stomach, police said. She was later released. Police officers spotted the car in Harlem around 8 a.m. and followed it to the Bronx, where they believed the shooting occurred, Boyce said. Around 9 a.m., an NYPD Emergency Service Unit officer at the scene heard a gunshot and found the man lying in the street. EMS administered lifesaving medical treatment before he was taken to the hospital. Investigators said the man was transported in critical condition. Detectives determined that he did not have a gun on his person, but that he had taken one from his vehicle, Boyce said. EMS Superintendent Stanley Samuels told NBC New York that emergency responders had to clear a lane to reach the shooting victim. "Police had to open a lane, so people can get
