Ms. Justice's father, who is an octogenarian, has a small business and has "bad health," according to the court filing, and her son is about to earn his pilot's license. The justices want to know what to do with the woman's proceeds, and have thrown in $16 million in gifts to them. "For decades, the justices have made gifts to family members, with the understanding that they would donate the gifts to charitable organizations," Justice Stephen Breyer wrote in a Wednesday, April 11, letter to the court's three other justices. "The family's circumstances are difficult, but those circumstances are not a guestion of a failure to pay taxes or some other violation of the Code of Conduct," Mr. Breyer, a longtime friend and former classmate, wrote. Mr. Alito's 81-year-old mother is not a member of the court, but an anti-abortion group that Mr. Alito has funded and which is represented by the same lawyer who is making the case that it is appropriate for the justices to make gifts to the woman's family to pay her lawyer. The justices have also asked the eight-member court of appeals to weigh in. The justices have turned down appeals this month by two conservative Christian legal activists, arguing that it is too far removed from the political process for the courts to get involved. Ms. Justice's lawyer, Kannon K. Shanmugam, told the court he doesn't have any financial interest in the case — except for his fees, which are minimal. Mr. Alito — who was a law clerk for Justice Clarence Thomas at the time of the case — "retired from active practice in 1997 and has since devoted himself to the study of law in his free time," his lawyer said. He also noted that Justice Thomas had nothing to do with the case and that he has a "strong track record of donating to charitable causes." Mr. Breyer's response
