smtp_connection::{SMTPClient, SMTPSender}; let smtp_conn = SMTPClient::new(("my.mail.server", 25)) .unwrap_expect("could not connect to smtp server") let sender = SMTPSender::new(smtp_conn) .unwrap_expect("could not create sender"); let message = Message::default(); sender.send(message).unwrap_expect("could not send message");

this will silently succeed with no error. I've seen that Rust only emits exceptions when a method's function is returning an error type, but the code above looks like it has no exceptions in it. I've tried various error types like SMTPError and the following line fails with an exception: `error!(smtp_conn, "could not connect to smtp server")` How can I find the reason why this happens? I've also tried to explicitly catch all exceptions and that also doesn't help. Is there a way to only catch specific types of exceptions? A: None of them will actually propagate any exceptions, so the missing exception (it is not a real one, you can't find its type) is lost forever. In fact, Rust compiler (which has an automatic type inference) does not bother at all about types of exceptions that are not explicitly declared.
