The purpose of this study was to describe the nature and frequency of missed opportunities to prevent complications. Using the practice environment as a point of entry, the study population consisted of ambulatory care nurses and physicians who participated in the parent study, Oncology Care Model, involving the use of validated measures for evaluating the implementation of computer-based tools for preventing complications in chemotherapy patients. Study data from the parent study were used for the current study. Of a total of 834 participants, 554 participated in this study. Data were collected via pen-and-paper questionnaires from a random sample of nurses and physicians who were involved in providing direct care to participants in the Oncology Care Model parent study. Multivariate analyses showed that one missed opportunity to prevent complications occurred among the responders in each of the five domains of the practice environment, except for the system reliability domain. In general, missed opportunities to prevent complications were found to occur frequently among nurses and physicians who participated in the parent study. The findings indicate that nurses and physicians may be regarded as an important point of entry when addressing missed opportunities to prevent complications.
