The present invention relates to a self-propelled construction device for assembling prefabricated sections or elements into a building, such as a prefabricated building, in particular. It is known for prefabricated sections or elements to be assembled, by means of such a device, into a building which in turn includes a girder structure which in particular takes up the weight of the prefabricated elements. The known device essentially comprises a drive unit which in turn is connected to a girder structure. The girder structure is provided with longitudinal girder members which extend between the upper and lower ends of the girder structure and are arranged above and below a baseplate which is rigidly connected to the girder structure. The baseplate is designed to receive a prefabricated element, which can be of a variety of different shapes and sizes. The prefabricated element is arranged at least partially around the baseplate so that the longitudinal girder members bear against the prefabricated element. These longitudinal girder members can then be moved apart to fit the prefabricated element within the girder structure.
