Tourism in the Arab World From the majestic Pyramids of Giza to the Mausoleum of Khufu, the Arab world offers travellers a wide variety of attractions and unique cultural experiences. While the Arab World comprises more than 53 countries, no more than four of which are developed countries, it is a region with a population of almost a billion, with the most populated country being the kingdom of Saudi Arabia, which is home to about 14 million people. As tourism and travel in the Middle East began to pick up, the region's reputation began to improve, with the development of Gulf, the rapid expansion of tourism in emerging markets in Africa and Asia, as well as growing interest in destinations such as Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, Tunisia and Morocco. Increased interest in the region has also led to a quick increase in regional tourism, which grew from $5 billion in 1995 to $33 billion in 2011. Tourism in the Arab world is the second largest earner of foreign currency for most countries, and it is expected to continue to expand. This growth has been largely due to a series of factors, and the main ones include:

- The Arab world is culturally diverse, where modern and traditional values co-exist, and people's interest in travelling is increasing. This has led to the rise in demand for travel in the region. • The quick increase in urbanisation, which has led to increased demand for leisure travel, and growing interest in food and culture. • The emergence of new tourist destinations, such as Morocco, Tunisia and Jordan. • The opening of new routes which have led to an increase in tourists visiting the region, including the Haj and Umrah. The Arab world has also established itself as a favoured destination for package holidays. One of the reasons for this is the increase in travel time, which has led to an increase in demand for cultural tourism, and the emergence of destinations, such as the Grand
