The New York Times recently reported that "the campus culture in college football is headed more and more to a world of hazing, drugs, and violence," with 30 colleges reporting a rise in hazing incidents in the past five years. Colleges have come to accept hazing as a normal part of college life; it's not a problem so much as an issue whose only solution seems to be more and more prohibition. Hazing is basically a euphemism for physically or psychologically challenging a new recruit, and college football is currently being inundated with players who are unprepared for the rigorous demands of the game, more than 90 percent of whom won't be able to make the cut. Some are injured or killed by the hazing rituals they face on campus and in high school. And the frequency and intensity of hazing isn't changing, only the type. The thing that is really making the hazing trend so disturbing, however, is that these incidents are becoming increasingly dangerous. The New York Times article noted that, "since 2010, 152 college athletes have died in hazing incidents; an additional 193 have been c6a93da74d
