i couldnt actually get into the class, since its a closed course, but i got my second story published in passive aggressor magazine in december. its an awesome mag, their layout is sleek and inspiring and they cover different subjects with great insight, having gone to school with tom i know he is a great ambassador to the craft and creativity of writing. most importantly of all, use the chrome os update and install the latest version of google chrome (version 47). chrome os automatically patches the kernel for vulnerabilities discovered after release. everything is done in the cloud and if you get rid of your smartphone, there is no way to access the drive to look up lyrics. many of the text editors also have at least 1 pdf reader, so if you want to look up lyrics for any particular song, you can open the pdf reader and it will show you all the lyric sheets. a big plus. however, i use lyricwiki.ly, an online service. it maintains a page with all of the music lyrics for almost any major recording artist or band out there, along with their wikis. also, it has a bunch of other useful functionality as well. its very similar to google, so you can enter the lyrics by song title or artist. just google up their entry in lyricwiki and it will bring you to their wikis. when it comes to editing them, i like to use notepad ++, but really it doesnt matter. the point is, if you want to save the pdf sheets to your google drive, you can do it easily. and then read the lyrics on your smartphone. but the way to go is to open the songs lyrics in a google doc, and save them to google drive so you can access them from any computer anywhere.
