(eds) (2004). schooling for life and death. community, disability and risk. rowman & littlefield. isbn 0-8103-8189-2. this stimulating collection brings together a variety of studies, written by teachers and disability theorists, to emphasize the importance of considering disability and risk when addressing what appears to be the way of the future. the volume consists of six chapters that deal with education for life and death, the school community, disability and risk in schools, policy and legislation, placement and the educational system, and the importance of the social aspects of education. underlying all of these different perspectives is an increasing concern about both the risks posed to individuals and the greater society by those who are disabled and those who are not. i. the collection of essays about the education of disabled children and the people who support them is divided into the following sections: (1) the history of special education and disabled students; (2) special education for disabled children and the psychological and social dimensions of special education; (3) the teaching of disabled children, and the practice and philosophy of special education; (4) the legal and social implications of special education; (5) placement in special education schools; (6) the importance of inclusive education; and (7) the future of the disabled: implications for special education. readings were chosen to reflect a diversity of approaches to the subjects in the book and are representative of the authors' work in the areas of disability and special education. the book is well documented and includes extensive references. the book should be of significant interest to anyone who is interested in the education of disabled individuals and those who support them, as well as to those in positions of influence, and scholars and practitioners in special education, special education policy, and the educational psychology and disability fields. 5ec8ef588b
