That same day, Eaton called Blazer to lay out the situation. What Blazer did in response to this call is unclear, but he began a highly unusual and ill-advised press-conference in Miami. We don't know for sure why he chose to hold the conference there. But it was a town teeming with pressmen, agents and police. Blazer's attitude was that Interpol, FIFA and CONCACAF were gathering evidence to destroy him. 'He assumed they were there to take him out,' says the enforcement chief, Robert Hansaw, 'Blazer was paranoid.' Blazer lasted about a year and a half, according to his FIFA colleagues. When he left, so did the larger expenses. CONCACAF reimbursed U.S. Soccer for a $19,000-a-month Trump Tower apartment, and $2,600 a month for a subordinate property. His was an astute grasp of the situation. Because the clubs that sold media and marketing rights to FIFA tournaments were simply members, not parties to the agreements, Blazer argued that he could not be criminally liable for what the clubs had done. And certainly he couldn't be prosecuted for his own activities, since by that time he was an official. It was hard to tell which partner in crime had more hubris, but Blazer lived the larger lifestyle. In addition to occupying the $18,000-a-month Trump Tower property, he charged CONCACAF for a smaller one next door, reportedly for his cats. He also held a standing table at Elaine's, an Upper East Side restaurant where actors and mobsters mingled with cops and reporters, his driver waiting outside as he entertained dinner dates, some dressed in the lavish gowns he kept in his apartment for just such occasions. (He'd divorced in 1995.) To the tourists vying for tables at Elaine's, Blazer was clearly somebody. But even regulars were hard-pressed to explain precisely what he did. We all knew he was the only American in FIFA, says Anne Beagan, a press officer for the FBI who hung out at Elaine's.
