as faculty members teach a broader curriculum in the humanities, they are no longer confined to the traditional courses offered in the liberal arts. they are required to consider such disciplines as biology, chemistry, geology, and physics, as well as to teach reading, writing, and the use of technology. they are also required to teach interdisciplinary courses that involve the work of scholars from other disciplines. the humanities are concerned with the study of the entire human experience. they deal with all human problems, including those of the body, mind, and spirit. the humanities are concerned with a variety of subjects, including literature, art, history, philosophy, and religion. they provide opportunities for students to explore ideas about the relationship between the individual and society, the individual and his or her self, and the individual and his or her environment. these courses offer students the opportunity to consider the role of the humanities in understanding the world, including such topics as the evolution of civilization and the history of art, architecture, literature, film, religion, and the music of different cultures. humanistic studies are also a way of looking at the world from a comparative perspective, studying human behavior in the context of other cultures and societies. the study of the humanities involves the examination of works of literature, art, music, and other cultural forms. students who study the humanities are interested in the interpretation of human experiences in the context of the past and present. the humanities are also concerned with exploring the nature of knowledge and the process of knowledge building. students who are educated in the humanities learn to think critically and analytically about the historical origins of human thought and the relationship of human thought to cultural experience. 5ec8ef588b
