If you're a professional photographer, then you'll be glad to know that you can save time, money, and effort by using the Output as Web & Video option in the Save menu (File > Save). This opens a dialog where you can select a number of settings before saving your file. The dialog also gives you quick access to other options, such as using JPEG or turning the embedded ICC profile on or off. The first thing that is noticeable about this update is the interface. While you have been able to alter the interface at any point in the past, this update delivers a much more vibrant and modern look, with an interesting bokeh effect on the shape of each thumbnail, for example. While it's a bit jarring at first, it definitely makes the interface seem alive, since the graphical content is easily identifiable. On the left, you have the standard "home" panel, while on the right there's a similar panel, although this one provides a filter and general information about each image. Below that is a panel providing you several options, both at the beginning of the editing process and in bulk. The last option is the catalog, which is the one you are most likely to use. Above and below the main panel are two panels that can surely be compared to the ones found in Apple's photos app. Under the previous version, you had a viewfinder, the same panel used to preview and select images. Also, you had a panel where you could navigate within the images, select a specific area for cropping, and so on. With this, however, you can now expect Adobe to include more options, such as making it easier for you to access the catalog without needing to open it first.

With the help from Adobe, CUNY Research Foundation's Data Visualization Research Group , who have over 30 years experience in teaching and curriculum development, and academics from Data Visualization , we have created the Data Visualization for Teachers Guidesto help instructors and educators navigate the world of Data Visualization . They represent over 30 years of experience in curriculum development, course design and pedagogy, and were instrumental in the transition of the Data Visualization Center at NYU's Vera Russell institute to a new home for teaching, research and community development at CUNY Research Foundation, launched in October 2019. CUNY Teacher Curriculum Planet is a web site designed to help teachers in the public school system make curricular changes by exploring CUNY's research and collecting curriculum resources based on areas of focus. The site's resource pages contain a variety of lesson plans, examples of how to teach different subjects, and developmentally appropriate curricular materials. These resources can be adapted to help K-12 teachers both in traditional learning environments (such as NYC's public school system) and high-quality charter schools, as well as K-12 teachers working in alternative settings or in the home. The site also contains lesson plans for teachers who might want to bring more of a digital component into their day. The curriculum for each subject is organized around the specific learning objective. They're mostly tutorial level, to introduce a new topic, but some are introductions, so teachers can get an overview of the subject. A number of the fits systems, occupational programs, and CUNY university coursework are also collected in this site.
