with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder: a review of the literature. The aim of this review was to evaluate the literature concerning the central mechanisms through which the brains of persons with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder release stress hormones. The PubMed, PsycINFO, and MEDLINE databases were searched for the terms "adrenocorticotrophic hormone," "cortisol," and "attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder" between January 2007 and April 2010. Because of the difficulty in defining the more specific age for stress-hormone secretion in healthy people and in distinguishing it from the age of stress hormone hypersecretion in persons with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder, only studies with the largest sample sizes were selected. Published data on cortisol levels in adults with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder have been reported to be elevated compared with that of healthy people. High-frequency electroencephalograms (EEGs) and brain activation studies did not find results compatible with a central deficit in information processing in individuals with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder. The few studies in which the effects of selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs) on cortisol levels in persons with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder were investigated have shown that SSRIs either suppress plasma cortisol levels or have no effect. Future studies are needed to determine the causes of hypercortisolism in persons with attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder.
