Desktop screen capture The first major addition to the software has to be screen capture. With support for screen resolutions, and mov files, this new capture tool makes sure that you get an excellent screen capture of your desktop. On launch, you're asked to log in to a specific service, so the application knows where to upload videos, but the account can be configured later on as well. In any case, you have to add an account sooner or later. The process is pretty easy, and mostly requires you to write down credentials. A drop down menu lets you select services like Facebook, YouTube, Vimeo, Viddler, or Dailymotion. On the other hand, advanced options give you the possibility to connect to a custom domain. Multiple import and capture methods All that's left to do after connecting to an account is select the video and upload it. Fortunately, there are several sources the video can be grabbed from. First of all, you can load a video from your computer, with support for MP4, AVI, MPEG, WMV, MOV, TS, FLV, VOB, and SWF. Furthermore, you can set up a connected camera and record activity, after which the application loads the video and lets you upload it. Last but not least, there's the option to capture screen activity in a video. Several details can be added before the upload starts, such as title, description, and keywords. Sadly, there aren't any editing options except for a crop tool. On an ending note Taking everything into consideration, we can say that Vigleo is a practical utility that can help you keep your fan base happy by uploading latest streams and creations in a simple process. The overall design lets anyone quickly accommodate, while recording options make sure you depend on less external tools. Which is the best Backup App for Android?
