One of the main additions of Lightroom 5 is the introduction of the Grid. Installing the Grid is as easy as highlighting the relevant area in your image. The Grid is a live view that displays the area highlighted, but is not necessarily the size that you see in the image you are editing. Instead, it is the size that will be displayed when you will print, email or share your image. For example, if you want to check how many people are in the picture you are editing, you can drag it to the Grid. The Grid will expand to allow you to vivify the mentioned area, and you get a continuous frame of the composition of the image in question. To make it clear, the frame of the Grid represents the maximum image resolution, while the actual dimensions of the frame are represented on the left side. Lightroom has also overhauled its photo processing algorithms through the focus on the new concept of quick processing. What does this mean? It means that you can now conduct a quick and simple edit - rather than having to wait for the process to conclude. This is the big benefit of Lightroom, which is that you can quickly and easily move through your images, apply whatever corrections you desire and close them. This is especially advantageous, as you don't necessarily need to re-open your file, since the edits will automatically be stored in memory, and you can later undo those changes. What's great is that, compared to Lightroom 3 and older, the basic workflow is now much faster. The tool will automatically recognize when the auto-enhancements fail, and you also get a summary of what you need to modify in the image - so you don't have to remember the instructions.
