Thank you for the recommendation about Cineform's RAW conversion software. Though on test, I can't see any difference in the result after the conversion. Generally, it seems to be much more tedious to work with RAW, since it is tricky for the software to guess the right settings.
The not so good: 1. Fixed lens quality is a bit lower than that of lightroom. 2. Some filters don't work quite as you would wish. 3. Missing on layers doesn't work perfectly. 4. The app is running very quietly on my laptop, but doesn't close out properly. 5. The control panel is a bit annoying to navigate.
So with the state of Adobe Photoshop CS5, the developers are having issues and the program is being developed basically on a trial and error basis. I have been impressed with Photoshop CS6, but will have to see if I can fix some of the issues. The issues with Photoshop: 1. Poor brush engine- hard to get a brush to stroke the desired amount of pixels. 2. Layer tools are not always the best. 3. Crop tool, sadly, if you press Ctrl+C, you are cropped, instead of selecting the image to crop. 4. Straighten Crop, pressing the straighten button works, but filling in the crop box is the opposite of what you are doing. Pressing Ctrl+T then creates the opposite crop as you wanted. 5. Color palette is a dream, filling in with colors is a imposnable task. 6. Eyedropper tool does work, but the color is a bit of an over lap, and almost a too bright.

Lightroom is my absolute go to program everyday. It has the most compatibility of any software. I recently upgraded to CS6 and I am very happy with it. I have uninstalled Photoshop continuouslly because it just seemed to get slower and slower as time went on.
