If you already have the iPad and you want to have a keyboard, the iPad Pro Keyboard is a must-have. It is certainly the best option available in the Apple store right now. It works fantastically well with the iPad and the iPad Air 2, and yet for any device that doesn't exceed 1.5kg, it's a bit too wide for comfort. If you have an iPad mini 3, you'll also find that the keyboard is also a bit too wide for this device. What you probably need to know about the new keyboard for the iPad is that it's included in the price of the iPad Pro. It's a standard Apple keyboard that comes with the iPad and appropriately costs $79. If you want you can also buy it separately in the Apple store and keep the original keyboard that comes with the iPad Air 2, but from a cost perspective, it's better to pay $79 for the new keyboard. The Apple keyboard continues to be useful if you simply don't have an iPad Pro. However, if you already have one, you don't need anything else but the iPad Pro. Adobe may need to work on improving both Lightroom and Photoshop if it wants to cement its position in the world of professional photography. Over the past year, the Adobe Creative Suite has been growing its professional offering by leaps and bounds. The recent introduction of Photoshop CC is an important first step in supporting the pros. These features were previously only available to high-end pros. This will improve the image editing workflow of all users, but they still need to provide a full suite of RAW editing tools without the need of third-party plugins. This is a major challenge, but Photoshop has proven it can thrive in a world of tradeoffs. Let's hope for a future filled with more open and competitive alternatives.
