The TIFF is meant to be the superior format for printing and can easily handle huge numbers of data points — consider the amount of data sometimes printed on a police crime photo. If you need this data in the near term, TIFF should be your format. Again, I don't really like Adobe's Lightroom interface quite as much as the previous version. I don't like the UI for individual columns or for image browser-like views. I don't really like the way you're meant to have to open a Browse window each time you import an image, and I don't like the way you're always reminded of the fact that you're opening an image in a new view every time. Some of these changes are good, albeit minor, and some are not. I don't mind that the Display Settings feature no longer lets me put images on-screen like the old version, though I would like for it to give me the option to restore the view as it used to be. However, I am glad that the previous "macro" function was scrapped and replaced with the ability to apply similar adjustments to every image in a series without changing their individual settings. The process remains ungainly but effective. The changes to some of the views ameliorate the problems of the previous version and, more importantly, Digital Photo Professional makes up for the lack of Layers. These are minor and overall, not a dealbreaker. Overall, Adobe made a good case for Lightroom 5 that it has seen a lot of improvement. I still don't know how I feel about it quite yet. In terms of RAW processing, the product shines. The new features are good, but I don't yet know if they're enough for me to use the new version. The UI lacks polish, too. For now I will stick with Lightroom 4, hopefully for another year or so. I'm sure by the time the new Lightroom hits the market, it will be on par with the competitors. Once again, Adobe makes it easy to just get the job done - another plus in its favor.
