Q: Do supervisors of PhD students evaluate the usefulness of their time as a supervisor? In a PhD program, there are many people who are both teaching assistants and supervisors. As a TA I am expected to evaluate the usefulness of my time as a TA. As a student, am I expected to evaluate the usefulness of my time as a supervisor? A: This is a good question. I have been a TA and a supervisor myself. The question to me, however, is "do you view them as (completely) separate roles?" My views are: Yes, you are expected to evaluate the time you spent as supervisor. You are evaluating you, not them. You have a duty to manage your time productively and efficiently, and as a supervisor you would expect the same from your students. Part of this will include evaluating your time as a supervisor. As an example, you may be asked to evaluate papers by one of your graduate students. You may not agree with their choice of theoretical framework, but you should be happy for them to choose this theory. Your expectation would be that they use the theory and are productive in implementing it.

A: This will probably vary depending on the program. Some programs tend to think of teaching assistant duties in distinct from student services duties, while others have a more shared workload. In my experience, the latter is more common. I personally treat my teaching assistant role as primarily a way to help students succeed at their research, and some of the time they'll seek advice from me on how to do that better (overall assessment of my class performance). But as a supervisor for someone else's research, I definitely expect to be required to evaluate how my time as a supervisor is being used. Usually, this will take the form of being asked to look through papers. For instance, my TA students will regularly get an assignment to submit a paper, and I'd look through their papers before this submission. But as their supervisor, I'd be expected to do something similar.

A: I would evaluate it in a similar fashion to how I evaluate TA's. The big difference is that I would expect to be able to evaluate myself (and my undergraduate assistants) on a regular basis and be held accountable for my actions. Welcome to my blog
